NC WILDLIFE COMMISSION – JAMES TOMBERLIN

Mayor Fontaine introduced James Tomberlin from the North Carolina Wildlife Commission. He is here to talk to the group about coyotes. Manager Powers reminded the group that Mr. Tomberlin was here a few years ago to talk about the Town’s deer population.

Mr. Tomberlin stated that North Carolina is divided into 9 districts. He is from District 7 which covers 11 counties. He gave a presentation on the history, biology and management of the coyote population. He noted the top four (4) concerns expressed are: 1) presence in the area; 2) impact on other wildlife species; 3) livestock damage and 4) crop damage.

History: The coyotes are not native to North Carolina. They are native to the short-grass prairie west of the Mississippi prior to European settlers arriving. As roads were built and lands developed and the coyotes' natural predators (wolves & cougars) were eradicated, it allowed the coyotes to proliferate and move across the lands in a short period of time. They now inhabit all states in the USA.

Biology: The coyote is very adaptable to the landscape and the environment. A mature coyote is about two (2) feet tall at the shoulder, three (3) to four (4) feet in length and typically weighs between 25 and 40 pounds, varying in color from blonde to black with shades in between. They generally mate for life and actively defend the territory where they have their offspring. Mating season is generally from January to March with a gestation period of about 60-63 days. An average of 4 to 6 pups per litter are born from April to June and emerge from the den around 3 weeks of age and are weaned from 5 to 7 weeks. Most of the young will eventually disperse, leaving the area of their birth.

Studies have been done to track the coyote's natural movements. One reason coyotes are successful is they are omnivore – eat anything available – plant material, feral or domestic animals, produce, insects, trash, pet food left outside, bird seed, etc.

Humans and disease (rabies or canine distemper) cause most coyote deaths. A decrease in competition for available resources allows the healthy coyotes left to thrive. Litter sizes increase and pup survival goes up. The ability of the coyote to fluctuate is a reason they are successful. Data was reviewed of coyotes tagged with GPS tracking showing they can transverse hundreds of miles in a few months. It will be virtually impossible to eradicate the coyote. It would require 70% of the population to be killed annually.

Management: There are three (3) things to help manage the coyote population: 1) how coyotes impact other wildlife; 2) how they interact with humans and 3) how they interact with livestock.

Wildlife: The coyote impact will vary across the landscapes. The red wolves and cougars, the coyote's natural predator out west, were killed off due to land development, etc. There are no natural predators for the coyote in this area. They do play an ecological role providing some balance by catching feral cats, small rodents, insects, etc. They mainly hunt from dusk to dawn but can be seen during the day. Coyotes can climb trees.

Humans & Livestock: Three (3) areas are looked at: disease; safety and degradation or damage.

Statistics from 1990 to 2015 show that positive rabies cases were mainly from racoons, skunks and possums. There have been 14 documented rabies in coyotes in the last 25 years. Most calls from people about coyote sightings is because food has been left out – pet food, garbage, etc. It is recommended to minimize attracting wildlife to your property that you keep pet food indoors, keep bird feeders clean and purchase feeders that keep seeds off the ground, pick up fallen fruit from trees, keeping pets on a leash and cats indoors.

Lethal tools include trapping, hunting and degradation permits. A degradation permit gives you the legal ability to remove the animal out-of-season when there is damage to property. Coyotes are not regulated as a game animal since they are not native here. From a hunting standpoint, you can shoot them year-round, at night with no limit. Trapping is the only regulation in place for coyotes in order to protect the native creatures. The season for trapping coyotes goes from November 1st to February 28th.

Mr. Tomberlin stated that other information is available by visiting the website: www.ncwildlife.org or calling the NC Wildlife Helpline at 866-318-2401. Also, informational handouts are available at Town Hall. Mayor Fontaine thanked Mr. Tomberlin for the presentation. No Action Taken
